Registration is on a first-come, first-served basis

About the Discussion

There have been numerous national and high-profile examples of racial profiling and allegations of discrimination at the hands of law enforcement and criminal justice officials. Yet the problem is not just a national one--it is deeply rooted in our own local communities and in the criminal justice system itself.

Doug Glanville, a retired Major League Baseball player residing in Hartford, wrote in a widely publicized article that he was the victim of racial profiling while shoveling his own driveway during the winter of 2014. He has, since that time, attempted to turn his encounter into an opportunity for positive dialogue and an impetus for change on both a local and national level.

Doug will join Hartford Police Chief James C. Rovella as well as Matt Ritter, State Representative and an attorney at Shipman & Goodwin, for this timely discussion.

We will discuss racial profiling and the issue of trust between police and the community. We will also discuss possible changes in the criminal justice system, such as sentencing guidelines, prison closure and other reform efforts at the local and state level.

Our Panel:

Douglas M. Glanville Former MLB Player with the Chicago Cubs, Writer for NY Times and ESPN Analyst

James C. Rovella Hartford Police Chief

Matthew D. Ritter State Representative 1st Assembly District - Hartford Counsel, Shipman & Goodwin

Jessica L. Ritter Moderator Partner, Shipman & Goodwin

There will be a Q&A following this discussion.

Light refreshments will be served. Please feel free to invite a guest.
